MANN REPORT RESIDENTIAL FEATURED STORY OF THE WEEK

LOOKING UP WITH LEROY STREET STUDIO

When it comes to the architecture and interior design of a space, people likely think of its four walls, lined with art and windows that give the space its character and structure. People don't often spend time looking up—until now, that is. A new trend in residential interior design has seen the utilization of the ceiling as a vital factor in the overall feel of a home. Tying in both art and function, architects and designers work together in the construction of a space by creating something complete and uniquely dynamic. One such location is the West Village's newly developed 90 Morton Street—a former printing warehouse turned state-of-the-art luxury condominium.
